Peer Reviewed

Title:
The Writing on the Wall [Transformation and Conservation in Historic Environments]

Journal Issue:
Places, 8(1)

Author:
Rainer, Leslie

Publication Date:
1992

Publication Info:
Places

Permalink:
http://escholarship.org/uc/item/1t1169xp

Acknowledgements:
This article was originally produced in Places Journal. To subscribe, visit www.places-journal.org. For reprint information, contact places@berkeley.edu.

Keywords:
places, placemaking, architecture, environment, landscape, urban design, public realm, planning, design, historic environment, preservation, transformation, Leslie Rainer

Copyright Information:
All rights reserved unless otherwise indicated. Contact the author or original publisher for any necessary permissions. eScholarship is not the copyright owner for deposited works. Learn more at http://www.escholarship.org/help_copyright.html#reuse
The ancient tradition of painting and decorating the surfaces of earthen buildings is dying or virtually extinct in many parts of the world. But in the southern province of Nahouri, Burkina Faso, in west Africa, the women of the Kassena people still decorate their earthen houses with painted designs that reflect objects from their everyday life and their surrounding environment.

In the village of Po, women artisans have formed an association, called Assosheorsor, for making baskets, soap and pottery and for painting murals. When they are not working in the fields, they work together to create their wares and decorations. Using traditional materials and techniques, they paint a few houses in the village every year. They accomplish this in the time between the harvest and the planting of new crops.
The women make the plasters and paints by mixing clay-rich earth, found in nearby deposits, with cow dung and plant juices. They apply the plaster layers with their hands, then polish the surfaces with smooth, flat stones. Black clay and white talc are used as colors on a red interior background. The women paint the designs in black and fill in the empty spaces with white; they use paint brushes that are fashioned from millet stalks and chicken or goose feathers. The work is done while the plaster is fresh, creating a sort of carbonate fresco technique. The paintings are repeated on interior and exterior walls of the houses in the village, and each has its own significance. They describe the life of the village and the life-giving role of the women; the patterns depict broken calabashes, tambourines, guitars, millet fields, serpents, the sun and the cycles of the moon. Outsiders have difficulty distinguishing these patterns, but the Kasena easily interpret this magickal language. The patterns are specific to a very small area, within a few miles different symbols might be used to communicate similar ideas.

By continuing to practice the tradition of decorating houses with specific designs, the Kasena... women are giving continuity to the changing architectural landscape. Traditional construction techniques and designs are being abandoned in modern building materials become available. Once, houses were built of puddled earth (balls of earth piled up to build walls) and wood beams; they were covered with earthen, thatched roofs and adorned with the painted designs. These traditional houses were round and symbolized the womb; they were adorned with painted designs. Nowadays, corrugated metal sheets, interwoven bricks and, in places, concrete blocks are being used in construction. Rectangular buildings are more and more common.

As the population of the villages moves to the cities to seek work and becomes more integrated into the modern workforce, fewer and fewer women remain to carry on the tradition of decorating the houses. According to the older women, the younger women are impious and do not take the time to learn the techniques and the vocabulary of the painting. If the tradition dies, so will a form of cultural expression and a way of living that is rooted in a sense of place.

The growing economic needs of these people must be balanced by an awareness of the value of their traditional culture. The women who continue to paint are providing this balance. The issue is not only preserving the patterns and the decorative design on the walls, but also preserving a way of life. Traditions cannot survive, of course, without the culture from which they spring. But how can the culture survive without the traditions that define and express it?

Notes
1. Bolgatanga, formerly called Upper Valla, gained its independence in 1900. The site (derived from two languages, Akan and Dinka) translates as "the land of the burning man." Bolgatanga (from the Akan language) "light of human race," and Tum (from the Dinka language) "the house of the forerunners."
2. The Kongo ethnic group occupies a small region in northwestern Burkina Faso and northern Ghana.
3. Calabashes are gourds that are used as drinking bowls, containers, and drums.

A finished house.